

Opening Windows on Science

If only academic lecturers were more entertaining. Instead of a head-down, monotone-drone over slides packed full of indecipherable equations, they could face their audience and learn to provoke and inspire. If only we could have peer-reviewed science described in a fun and interesting style, by experts who were self-motivated to communicate in the very best ways they can. Perhaps we could also have all the talks from the best conferences available to everyone, at any time. Wouldn't it be great if academia worked like this?
